schools and who had been away for a period from any school.

Money was scarce and many could not afford to pay fees.

Employers found it impossible to hold on to their apprentices and this is where the schools can step in and help by affording all every opportunity to attend technical schools.

There was no need to be too pessimistic - we should now prepare students for employment later on when times were sure to improve.

In making further reference to economies Mr. Eltham suggested that the need for the continuance of Mr. Maxwell's position and that of Miss Knight in the art school should be carefully examined.

It would be necessary for the Council to adopt a smaller maintenance rate if the school overdraft was to be reduced.

It was a good plan to have a linking of the staffs of the junior and senior schools and teachers should exercise some influence over boys. Certain members of staff could be used for the intermediate stage between the junior and the senior schools. The amalgamation of classes, where numbers were small, was advisable. Costs per student must not exceed a certain limit.

The following members were appointed as Training Committee: Mr. D. S. Maxwell, Mr. D. R. Donaldson, Mr. Mansfield and Mr. C. Heathcote.
