Opposition health spokesperson Georgie Crozier said in Parliament that the Health Department provided "selective reports".

Ms Crozier said she was still fighting for FOI documents in VCAT, as well as 400 pages of redacted pages from Knox Council that weren't provided to the inquiry.

"I think it is shameful that they did not come and give us all the information."

Liberal MP Matthew Bach said Prof Sutton "grievously" misled the first inquiry by stating all suppliers of food were thoroughly investigated for traces of listeria.

"This was not true, and what is worse is senior officials within the Department of Health and Human Services knew it was not true.

"Now, the story from senior people in the department, including the chief health officer, is that this information was never passed to him."

Labor MP Tien Kieu said the closure was based on "very strong scientific evidence" – a close genomic match between samples from Mrs Painter and ICF.

"That has been scientifically determined to be very unique and has not been found anywhere in Victoria."

"I certainly understand that Victoria Police may be continuing investigations, and I would say other anti-corruption and other oversight agencies would possibly be in a very good place to conduct these types of investigations."

ICF has launched a Supreme Court bid against the health department and Greater Dandenong.

It is seeking $50 million compensation for what it asserts was its wrongful shut down.

Victoria Police is currently investigating allegations of corruption against public officials.
