A CHILD'S STORY.

"You gave me strange feelings, anyone will be living in this old shack." Thus thinking, I made my way to the old dwelling that stood among the trees, hoping to be able to obtain a drink—not one of the biggest surprises of my life. "What a funny old place," I thought, as I strolled up the little, grass-covered track that had at one time been a path. The boards of the hut were hanging every way but 'the right way, and the roof was half-way on and half-way off.

Dirt covered the only part of the window that remained, while an old chimney tried to imitate the crooked grey gum tree that grew imidly on the dilapidated door.

and waited for I don't know what.

Was I dreaming, or what was wrong?-for there before me was butler, beautifully dressed in black and white. He appeared to be a very stately man, especially by the way he spoke. "Good afternoon,

Miss." he said. "do you wish to see the master?" "The master, oh no, really wanted a drink of water," replied "Please come in." he in
